To the Committee of the Federal Communications Commission:

It has come to my attention via the Indiana Attorney General that numerous groups and self-serving organizations are attempting to weaken the consumer protections that we in the State of Indiana have requested and approved, each on an individual basis, in regards to our privacy and freedom from irritation, harassment, and imposition by outside sources or agencies on our home or business telephones.

I trust that the Commission will recognize that for so many of our state citizens requesting such a service from our Attorney General, that we do not want or need intervention by outside regulatory controls. Our law does what we have requested it to do; keep intruders (via telephone) out of our homes and lives.

Since the implementation of the so-called "No Call List", to my great satisfaction, I very rarely receive unwanted solicitations. Those I do receive are frequently from charitable organizations, colleges, and political groups. They apparently are not under the same constraints as "for profit" organizations.

Unfortunately, this protection does not extend to my business telephones. I get twenty or more calls per week from businesses trying to sell me products and services I cannot do without.

Regardless, I implore the FCC's to not weaken the current Indiana No Call List and, in fact, encourage them to adopt a similar regulations protecting business from the imposition of lost time from telemarketers.

Respectfully,

Robert Stouder
